

Feedback Loops

Feedback loops must be bidirectional: information gathered from our engagement with communities and families should be used to inform leaders and decision-makers about necessary changes to practices, programs, and policies. Afterwards, any resulting learnings and actions should be communicated back to the families and communities involved, completing the feedback loop.

